About the Organiser

The Centre for Conflict Resolution, Cape Town, South Africa, was established in 1968. The organisation has wide-ranging experience in conflict interventions in Southern Africa and is working on a pan-continental basis to strengthen the conflict management capacity of Africa’s regional organisations. Its policy research focuses on peacekeeping and peacebuilding in Africa; region-building and regional integration on the continent; relations between Africa and the European Union (EU); the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) in Africa; and South Africa’s bilateral and multilateral foreign policy.

Executive Summary

The Centre for Conflict Resolution (CCR), Cape Town, South Africa, hosted a policy advisory group seminar at Le Franschhoek Hotel, Western Cape, from 9 to 10 May 2015 on “Security and Governance in the Great Lakes Region”.

The Great Lakes region – focusing largely around Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), Rwanda, and Uganda – is central not only to Africa’s geography but also to continental security and governance. The seminar brought together about 30 mostly African policymakers, academics, and civil society actors to assess the major obstacles to peace, security, and governance in the Great Lakes region. The meeting, which focused in particular on the ongoing political crises in Burundi and the DRC, also sought to craft effective and credible strategies to overcome these obstacles.

1. The Great Lakes Region: Progress, Problems, and Prospects

Poverty, weak state and regional institutions, and the failure to undertake effective security sector reform have made post-conflict peace precarious, and governance uneven, in the Great Lakes region. The region has become a “militarised space”, and needs to remove militarist and autocratic influences from its politics. Citizens of the region are threatened both by armed groups, sometimes including the security forces of their own governments, and by breakdowns in the ability of states to provide public services and protection from common crime. Despite these daunting challenges, in the past decade there has been some progress towards the goal of achieving durable peace in the region. Notably, in February 2013 the Peace, Security, and Cooperation (PSC) Framework for the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Region was signed by the DRC, Angola, Congo-Brazzaville, South Africa, Tanzania, and Uganda, as well as the Central African Republic (CAR), Burundi, Rwanda, South Sudan, and Zambia, under the auspices of the United Nations (UN), the African Union (AU), the Southern African Development Community (SADC), and the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region (ICGLR).

The ultimate aim in the Great Lakes region is the achievement of a durable peace in which its 127 million citizens can live their daily lives without fear. While security must be addressed as the foundation for the consolidation of peace and socio-economic development, military approaches like the SADC-led intervention brigade within the United Nations Organisation Stabilisation Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUSCO) provide only partial solutions. Achieving durable peace will also require addressing the root causes of conflicts, which include weak and autocratic governance; illicit exploitation of natural resources; land disputes; unresolved questions of refugee resettlement and citizenship; inadequate trust among regional leaders; lack of reconciliation at the community level; and inequitable economic growth.

2. The Democratic Republic of the Congo

Two intertwined factors drive conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo: weak state legitimacy, and interference by its neighbours. President Joseph Kabila is constitutionally prohibited from running for a third term, but may seek to do so by changing the constitution, or to prolong his stay in power by delaying the November 2016 presidential elections. A proposed census that would have required delaying of elections was blocked by the Congolese parliament in January 2015 after violent protests in Kinshasa. However, predictable problems with the complex local elections planned for October 2015 could be used as a rationale for delaying the presidential polls.
The persistent insecurity in the DRC that began with the 1996 to 2003 conflict, and is now localised in the country’s eastern provinces of North and South Kivu, is deeply regionalised. Many of the largest and most dangerous militias in the Kivus are tied to conflicts in neighbouring states, including the Rwandan-backed March 23 Movement (M23), which was part of Rwanda’s efforts to pursue its security and economic interests in the DRC. The international response to the violence in the eastern Congo has tended to be dominated by three assumptions: first, that the insecurity is primarily about national and regional conflicts over the illegal exploitation of resources; second, that the worst result of the war is violence against women (especially sexual violence); and third, that the solution is to expand state capacity. In reality, much of the violence is driven by local conflicts over land and political power (which regional actors such as Rwanda and Uganda have exploited). A disproportionate focus on violence against women can perversely allow armed groups to gain attention and leverage by perpetrating such violence. Finally, extending state capacity without first establishing state legitimacy may expose citizens to abuse and alienate them from the government in Kinshasa.

3. Burundi

President Pierre Nkurunziza is seeking to take advantage of an apparent loophole in the constitution to run for a third term, in violation of the 2000 Arusha agreement, which formally ended the phase of the country’s civil war that started in 1993 and killed an estimated 300,000 people.

The current crisis indicates deeper problems in the political and social arrangements that have prevailed in Burundi since the end of its civil war by 2005. The ruling National Council for the Defence of Democracy-Forces for the Defence of Democracy (CNDD-FDD) has never seemed to hold the Arusha agreement in high regard. It refused to sign the accord in 2000, and only ended its armed opposition in 2003. In 2010, the CNDD-FDD gained unrestrained power over the government, as a result of an opposition boycott of the elections, and has since sought to consolidate its power and shrink the space for dissent and democratic participation. Any long-term resolution of Burundi’s challenges must not only enforce democratic norms but also support the development of more mature democratic institutions, a task that should be led by African powers such as South Africa.

4. Regional Actors: Rwanda and Uganda

The aggressive foreign policies of Rwanda and Uganda towards the region, particularly their support for armed groups in the DRC, has already contributed to instability in the Great Lakes. While it is easier to criticise Kigali and Kampala when they violate the sovereignty of other countries, respect for sovereignty should not continue to deflect attention from domestic repression in both countries. Uganda and Rwanda are formally multi-party democracies with elections approaching in 2016 and 2017, respectively. However, they are both effectively dominated by a single party, with long-serving leaders who have taken steps to restrict effective internal dissent.

In only 21 years since the 1994 genocide that killed an estimated 800,000 people, Rwanda has become touted as an example of successful development and an “island of stability” in a troubled region. However, its gains in areas such as the provision of public services mask the fact that its stability is based largely on fear. The government engages in violent suppression of dissent at home, and also supports armed groups in the DRC. Uganda has played the role of both “arsonist” and “fire-fighter” in the region. It has supported several peace initiatives, including the Kampala peace talks that led to the surrender of the M23 in December 2013, but it has also backed armed groups that have fuelled conflicts in the DRC.
5. Regional Actors: South Africa, the Southern African Development Community, and the African Union

South Africa has long played a critical role in peacebuilding efforts in the Great Lakes region. In Burundi, former South African president Nelson Mandela took over facilitation of the Arusha peace process in 1999 after the death of the former president of Tanzania, Julius Nyerere. South Africa’s deputy president (now president), Jacob Zuma, succeeded Mandela in this role in 2002. Under President Thabo Mbeki, Tshwane (Pretoria) began hosting the inter-Congolese dialogue in Sun City in 2002, which led to the adoption of a transitional constitution for the DRC in 2003. South Africa explains its involvement in the Great Lakes region as acting within the framework of its membership of SADC. The organisation’s involvement in the Great Lakes dates back to 1997, when the DRC became a member with strong support from South Africa. MONUSCO’s current 3,000-strong intervention brigade, authorised in March 2013, is composed of troops from SADC members South Africa, Tanzania, and Malawi.

The African Union has also been an active player in the Great Lakes region, for more than a decade. In 2003, it deployed the African Union Mission in Burundi (AMIB). The 3,335-strong mission was led by South Africa and included troops from Mozambique and Ethiopia. AMIB was the first peacekeeping mission wholly planned and executed by members of the African Union. Since May 2013, the African Union and the United Nations have also jointly convened a regional oversight mechanism for the Great Lakes Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework.

The United Nations faces a pressing challenge in the DRC. In February 2015, UN military operations in the DRC were effectively halted. The immediate cause was the Kabila government’s decision to put two commanders who had been “red-listed” by the UN over allegations of human rights abuses in charge of the Congolese army’s operations against the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR). While the UN ban technically only applies to joint operations with the sanctioned commanders, military cooperation in general was affected by the dispute. The world body is also under pressure from Kinshasa to reduce its 20,000-strong peacekeeping force by more than a third. The most promising way forward is the creation of a concrete roadmap, one clearly and unequivocally endorsed by all major stakeholders and communicated not only to the government of the DRC, but also to the governments of its neighbours.

The Great Lakes region faces two core problems: animosity between national leaders, and the DRC’s inability to control its eastern provinces effectively. In the European Union’s (EU) analysis, neither problem is likely to be resolved without a focus on building the diplomatic and security sector reform capacity of regional organisations, such as the East African Community (EAC) and the Southern African Development Community. Regional intelligence capacity also needs to be developed in order to address illicit economic exploitation. In the short to medium term, Brussels is prepared to continue funding the security efforts of Africa’s security architecture, as seems necessary given its currently limited capacities. In the long term, however, the level of donor dependency in African institutions will remain a problem that leaves African regional bodies vulnerable to external agendas.
Policy Recommendations

The following ten recommendations emerged from the Franschhoek policy advisory group seminar of May 2015.

1. Autocratic governance structures throughout the Great Lakes region hinder national socio-economic progress, and have spread instability. Regional states themselves should adopt measures to ensure public debate and accountability for their foreign policies. Regional organisations such as SADC, the EAC, the ICGLR, and the AU can contribute to these changes by strengthening their diplomatic engagement in support of norms of democracy and human rights, as well as promoting civic engagement and civic education.

2. Central to any peacemaking strategy in Burundi must be efforts to address the divisions in the country’s ruling CNDD-FDD and opposition parties, as well as the violence of the CNDD-FDD’s Imbonerakure youth wing. Urgent diplomatic efforts are required to resolve the ongoing political impasse, but longer-term efforts to develop the capacity and democratic commitments of political parties in Burundi, as well as to reform politicised government agencies such as the National Commission on Land and Other Assets (CNTB) and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), are also essential.

3. Security sector reform throughout the region is a critical need. The Great Lakes region is a militarised space, in which political and military institutions have often become fused in ways that have hindered the development of democracy. A concerted diplomatic and reform effort is therefore urgently needed not only to prevent abuses among organised armed actors, but also to move states away from the use of fear and repression in their governance practices more generally.

4. Grassroots, bottom-up initiatives to promote peace and reconciliation, such as the work of local non-governmental organisations (including women’s organisations) and traditional conflict resolution processes, should be supported with financial, logistical, and technical resources. Examples of existing projects that could be built upon, or learned from, include the East African Court of Justice’s (EACJ) cooperation with civil society organisations in Uganda to promote human rights, the Swiss Tujenge Amani! programme in the DRC’s Kivu provinces, and Dutch support for decentralised land registration in Burundi.

5. Governments in the region and their external supporters should strengthen the conflict resolution capacity of existing regional structures, such as the Southern African Development Community, the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region, and the East African Community. One immediate way to strengthen the capabilities of regional organisations in the Great Lakes could be for SADC to complete its efforts to establish a liaison office in the DRC.

6. The African Union and the United Nations should take the lead in efforts to address the challenges of the Great Lakes region, assisted by African powers such as South Africa. The European Union, the United States, and China should play a supporting role. A coordinated, consistent, and coherent strategy will allow different actors to leverage their particular strengths, avoid partiality, and prevent regional actors from engaging in “forum shopping” that plays different mediators off against each other.
7. There must be a process of consultation and coordination among SADC, the AU, and other regional organisations, backed by the UN (including its technical bodies, such as the Department of Peacekeeping Operations [DPKO]), and the EU, to create a concrete roadmap and a unified strategy to resolve the impasse between the UN peacekeeping mission and the government of the DRC in order to forestall similar difficulties in the future. This strategy must be clearly conveyed not only to the government in Kinshasa, but also to governments in Kigali and Kampala.

8. The UN peacekeeping force in the DRC should develop an effective end-game to its 15-year mission in the country. One element of this strategy could be a redeployment of existing UN troops to strengthen the SADC-led intervention brigade. However, any exit strategy must be carefully considered and developed in cooperation with the AU, regional organisations, and the Congolese government in order to ensure that responsible national and regional structures are in place and adequately resourced before the UN withdraws from the country.

9. An international regime should be established that monitors and punishes illicit exploitation of the DRC’s mineral resources; such a system should be backed by the creation of a regional intelligence facility under the auspices of SADC or the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region. Without a more effective regime than the one currently in place, there will be insufficient incentive for regional actors to stop plundering the Congo’s resources.

10. Donor governments, the AU, and others with influence over Rwanda and Uganda must prevent these two countries from destabilising the region. Neither the legacy of the Rwandan genocide nor parochial national interests should stand in the way of holding all countries accountable to the same human rights standards. The AU, African governments, and the broader international community should ensure that norms relating to human rights and democratic governance are enforced in an even-handed manner including, where appropriate, through the use of targeted sanctions and judicial prosecutions.
Introduction

The Centre for Conflict Resolution (CCR), Cape Town, South Africa, hosted a policy advisory group seminar at Le Franschhoek Hotel, Western Cape, South Africa, from 9 to 10 May 2015, on “Security and Governance in the Great Lakes Region”. This report is based on discussions at this meeting and also includes material from a public dialogue on the “Challenges of Peacemaking in the Great Lakes Region”, held in Cape Town on 8 May 2015, as well as further research.

The Great Lakes region – focused largely around Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), Rwanda, and Uganda – is central not only to Africa’s geography but also to continental security and governance. In addition, the region has long been a site of global intervention in Africa, beginning with colonialism, which influenced both the region’s borders and its ethnic divides. More recently, it has been a theatre for peacekeeping operations (such as the United Nations Organisation Stabilisation Mission in the DRC [MONUSCO], as well as the African Union Mission in Burundi [AMIB]), peace enforcement missions (such as the European Union’s [EU] 2003 Operation Artemis in the DRC’s Orientale province), and electoral observation initiatives (such as the EU’s Election Observation Mission [EOM] to observe the DRC’s 2006 elections). The Great Lakes region is a major recipient of global aid and investment: the EU provided about €2.2 billion in aid to the region over the period 2008–2013, from its 10th European Development Fund (EDF) and related assistance programmes;1 China has invested heavily in minerals in the Great Lakes, including a $6 billion deal – originally negotiated in 2007 – that traded mining concessions in the DRC for infrastructure investment;2 and the United States (US) appropriated a total of $991.6 million in aid for countries in the region, largely for health but also including military assistance, in 2014.3 Reflecting continental and international attention to the region, a number of key actors have established special envoys to coordinate efforts, including the Special Envoy of the United Nations (UN) Secretary-General for the Great Lakes Region, Algerian diplomat Said Djinnit; the African Union (AU) Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region and former UN Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region, Senegal’s Ibrahima Fall; the South African Special Envoy to the Great Lakes, Eddy Maloka; and the EU Senior Coordinator for the Great Lakes Region, Belgian national, Koen Vervaeke.

The Centre for Conflict Resolution has established itself as a leading policy development, research, capacity-building, and training institution on peacebuilding issues in Africa, as well as on the Southern African Development Community (SADC), the UN, and the EU.4 CCR has more than 15 years of experience on the Great Lakes region. Between 1999 and 2011, the Centre organised conflict management capacity-building workshops for national human rights institutions involving representatives of Great Lakes countries such as Rwanda, Burundi, and Uganda. CCR’s capacity-building work in the DRC has demonstrated the value of training civil society and women’s groups in conflict resolution skills in collaboration with government institutions. These workshops have been complemented by policy research on the Great Lakes. In April 2010, for example, at the request of the SADC secretariat’s security organ, the Centre held a policy advisory group seminar in Cape Town that examined strategic mechanisms for enhancing the effectiveness of the Congolese government, civil society, SADC, the UN, and the broader international community in consolidating peace and security in the DRC. The Centre has also published 12 seminar reports, II book chapters, and 26 media articles related to the Great Lakes region over the past decade.5

The Franschhoek seminar took place as the Great Lakes region entered a two-year period of potentially significant political change, in which all four regional countries were scheduled to hold national and local elections. Unfortunately, while Burundi was set to begin the 2015–2017 election period in the region with legislative and communal elections in May 2015, at the time of the seminar this country was suffering a violent political crisis centred on Pierre Nkurunziza’s bid for a third presidential term, in defiance of the 2000 Arusha accord, which formally ended the phase of the civil war that began in 1993 and killed an estimated 300,000 people.6 The leaders of the DRC, Rwanda, and Uganda were similarly signalling their unwillingness to cede power, regardless of their countries’ laws or the desires of their citizens. Meanwhile, the Congo continued to struggle with persistent insecurity in its eastern provinces, a legacy of the regionalised 1996–2003 war and a consequence of the continued involvement of Rwanda and Uganda (two of the main belligerents in that conflict) with armed groups and economic exploitation in the DRC.

To address these issues, the Cape Town seminar brought together 30 mostly African policymakers, academics, and civil society actors to assess the major obstacles to peace, security, and governance in the Great Lakes region and to craft effective and credible policies and strategies to overcome these obstacles. The seminar focused, in particular, on the challenges faced by the DRC; the problems of, and prospects for, stability in Burundi; the roles of Rwanda and Uganda in the region; the influence of regional actors such as South Africa, SADC, and the AU; and the role of external actors such as the United Nations and the European Union.

In discussing these issues, seminar participants were invited to address five key questions:

1. How can the DRC and Burundi and the broader Great Lakes region be restored to functional, post-conflict democratic stability?
2. How can democratic governance be promoted effectively in Rwanda and Uganda, and how can both countries be encouraged to play a stabilising rather than destabilising role in the region?
3. How can the conflict management roles of South Africa, SADC, the AU, the UN, and the EU – and their special envoys – be more effectively harnessed to national and regional efforts?
4. What positive and locally sensitive models for addressing conflicts over ethnicity, land, and political or economic exclusion can be derived from the experiences of the countries in the Great Lakes?
5. How are violence against, and marginalisation of, women, youth, and sexual minorities related to regional conflict and poverty?
1. The Great Lakes Region: Progress, Problems, and Prospects

Achieving durable peace in the Great Lakes region requires concerted action at all levels. Problems of order and security must be addressed first, but the long-term focus needs to be on democratic governance and economic opportunity. It is critical to recognise the centrality of the Democratic Republic of the Congo not only to the geography of the region, but also to its politics, security, and economy.

The ultimate aim in the Great Lakes region is the achievement of a durable peace in which its 127 million citizens can live their daily lives without fear. Conflicts over power, ethnic identity, citizenship, land, and mineral and other economic resources have fuelled violence in the Great Lakes, including the 1972 Burundian genocide, in which between 200,000 and 300,000 people were killed; and the 1994 Rwandan genocide, in which an estimated 800,000 people were killed. Persistent insecurity in the DRC has resulted in over three million deaths. Seven other African states (Angola, Burundi, Chad, Namibia, Rwanda, Uganda, and Zimbabwe) fought in the Congo’s wars, and several more were involved less directly (such as Congo-Brazzaville, Libya, South Africa, Sudan, and Tanzania), which had a destabilising impact on the security complex of Central, Eastern, and Southern Africa. Poverty, weak state and regional institutions, and the failure to undertake effective security sector reform (SSR) have made post-conflict peace precarious, and governance uneven, in the region. All the states in the Great Lakes are formally multi-party democracies, but also engage in autocratic practices to various degrees, such as clamping down on opposition and restricting media freedom. Women and sexual minorities in the region have faced socio-economic marginalisation and violence.

Despite these daunting challenges, in the past decade there has been some progress towards the goal of achieving durable peace in the region. In the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa in February 2013, the Peace, Security, and Cooperation (PSC) Framework for the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Region was signed by the DRC, Angola, Congo-Brazzaville, South Africa, Tanzania, and Uganda, as well as the Central African Republic (CAR), Burundi, Rwanda, South Sudan, and Zambia. The accord was witnessed by representatives of the UN, SADC, the AU, and the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region (ICGLR).

However, fully achieving durable peace, with dividends for ordinary people, will be challenging. It will require addressing the root causes of conflicts, which include weak and autocratic governance; illicit exploitation of natural resources; land disputes; unresolved questions of refugee resettlement and citizenship; inadequate trust among regional leaders; lack of reconciliation at the community level; and inequitable economic growth. These issues were explored throughout the Cape Town seminar, but it is helpful to consider them broadly in the context of the “five Cs”- consolidation, citizenship, constitutionalism, capitalism, and contiguity.

7 See, for example, Gilbert M. Khadiagala (ed.), Security Dynamics in Africa’s Great Lakes Region (Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner, 2006). These types of conflicts are often entangled with each other – for example, ethnic notions of citizenship are often created or deployed in contexts over resources or political power. See, for example, Georges Nzongola-Ntalaja, “Citizenship, Political Violence, and Democratization in Africa”, Global Governance 10 (2004), pp. 403–409.
Consolidation

All regional states, particularly the DRC, should be supported in extending effective control over their territories. Some progress has been made in the eastern Congo, especially since the creation in March 2013 of the 3,000-strong SADC-led intervention brigade within the 20,000-strong UN mission in the Congo, involving South Africa, Tanzania, and Malawi. The brigade’s mandate represented a necessary shift to full-fledged peace enforcement, as the United Nations was being asked to conduct peacekeeping operations where there was no peace to keep.

However, MONUSCO’s new, more aggressive stance alone will not provide a long-term solution to this two-decade civil and regional war. The armed groups operating in the eastern Congo – such as the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), the Mai-Mai “self-defence” groups, and the Raia Mutomboki – have a variety of origins and agendas, and no one solution will be appropriate to address all of them. Many local people still do not see the relevance of MONUSCO to their daily lives. The ability for the UN-backed government to deliver basic social services, such as education and protection from common crime, is as important for state consolidation as the defeat of rebel movements. MONUSCO should coordinate more effectively with regional actors such as SADC, the East African Community (EAC), and the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region; as well as respect the sovereignty of the DRC in order not to undermine state consolidation efforts.11

Part of any effective consolidation of state authority involves effective security sector reform. Such reform has had limited impact in the DRC, in part because it has been massively under-resourced, has been driven too much by outside donors, and has been insufficiently “owned” by the Congolese themselves. Another controversial aspect of security sector reform has been the strategy of integrating former armed groups into the national army or into Congolese politics. The March 23 Movement (M23), for example, was defeated as an armed group in December 2013, but many Congolese are unhappy that the former rebel group has been allowed to survive as a political entity.12 Some see the government and the international community as being too willing to sacrifice accountability for stability.

Two other aspects of effective security sector reform need to be recognised, and not just in the DRC. First, such reform requires long-term engagement by both local actors and international supporters. For example, the government of Joseph Kabila would like to create a rapid reaction force as the nucleus of a reformed national army, but such a force cannot be created quickly or cheaply. Second, SSR is not just a military issue: the security sector also includes police and judicial systems.

Citizenship

The citizens of the Great Lakes region need inclusive political systems in which they are all treated as equal stakeholders by their governments, and institutions of citizenship developed in a context in which all citizens of each country can see themselves as belonging to a common political community. Contested citizenship has weakened regional states; given rise to rebel movements among groups who feel marginalised from political systems; and, at worst, been expressed in ethnic violence, including the genocides in Burundi (1972) and Rwanda (1994).

11 The EAC comprises Burundi, Kenya, Rwanda, Tanzania, and Uganda.
12 See Declaration of the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo at the End of the Kampala Talks, adopted 12 December 2013, para. 4; and Declaration of Commitments by the Movement of March 23 at the Conclusion of the Kampala Dialogue, adopted 12 December 2013, paras. 2, 5.
Constitutionalism

Constitutional order is characterised by equitable sharing of power, as well as institutions of participation and accountability. In the Great Lakes region, such order is threatened, particularly by militarisation. While a strong military is needed for state consolidation, the region has become a “militarised space”, and must eliminate militarist and autocratic influences from its politics. This problem is exemplified by Rwanda under Paul Kagame, who became president in April 2000 and was widely viewed as the true power behind the Rwandan throne during his tenure as vice-president and minister of defence under Rwanda’s first post-genocide president, Pasteur Bizimungu, between 1994 and 2000. Under Kagame, Rwanda has built a fairly strong state and there has been some socio-economic progress, but not on a basis of democratic governance.

Nor do other states in the region fare much better. Uganda has been ruled by Yoweri Museveni since he came to power as a guerrilla leader in January 1986. Uganda, Burundi, the DRC, and Rwanda all have leaders who are signalling their unwillingness to cede power, disregarding the will of the people and their constitutions. In Burundi and the DRC, this has already led to violent protest. While indefinite leadership by a single individual would not necessarily violate the rule of law if the constitution did not make provisions for term limits – as the constitutions of Burundi, the DRC, and Rwanda currently do – such limits are often an important means of ensuring that long-serving leaders do not come to be identified with the state itself and do not lose touch with the concerns of their citizens. Democratic constitutional governance also has an affinity with inclusion and human rights, and could help address problems of citizenship in the region.

Capitalism

Resolving the paradoxical situation in which the Great Lakes region finds itself – with people living in great poverty amid plentiful natural resources – will require an economic system with clear, enforceable, and equally applied rules, in which people can provide for themselves and their families. Much of the violence in the Great Lakes region is financed by the exploitation of the DRC’s natural resources, facilitated by the fact that neighbouring countries such as Rwanda and Uganda, as well as non-state actors (including both armed groups and international corporations), have taken advantage of the weak Congolese state. In addition, corruption within the state itself leads to unfair distribution of mineral and land rights. Pervasive lack of economic opportunity forces individuals into precarious or heavily exploited lines of work, such as small-scale farming and mining, or encourages them to join armed groups.

International systems, similar to the Kimberly Process for diamonds created in 2002, that monitor the conditions under which coltan, gold, charcoal, and other valuable resources from the DRC are produced, could help stem the tide of illegal exploitation and foster a market in which the Congo could benefit from its natural resources in order to promote socio-economic development. Such regimes would, however, be both technically and politically difficult to implement.

The Special Envoy of the United Nations Secretary-General for the Great Lakes Region, Said Djinnit, has worked to spur private investment in the region. However, this needs to be done in partnership with public institutions.

One of the strongest supports for regional peace would be if the DRC could be transformed into a capable “developmental state” – a state that can harness the power of markets for the benefit of its people by intervening to foster the development of internationally competitive industries. This would require ensuring that the government is accountable to all its citizens, and does not intervene in markets simply for the benefit of patronage networks centred on the Congolese capital of Kinshasa.

Contiguity

Problems in one Great Lakes country are rarely challenges for that state alone, as the Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework acknowledges. The fact that state borders run through areas with transnational ethnic groups and difficult geography means that there is often “contagion” of problems between states in the Great Lakes.

One of the most dangerous cases of contagion is the continued involvement of Rwanda and Uganda with armed groups in the eastern Congo. Contiguity also facilitates the movement of refugees throughout the region. About 144,000 refugees had fled Burundi to Tanzania, Rwanda, the DRC, Uganda, and Zambia by June 2015 due to the unrest over the upcoming elections in the country. If the crisis in the DRC deepens, it could unleash catastrophic refugee flows across the entire Great Lakes region.

Addressing these regional problems will require regional institutions to be properly resourced and strengthened. The International Conference on the Great Lakes Region, for example, was important in a number of constructive initiatives, including helping to create the PSC Framework; hosting the initial discussions that gave rise to the MONUSCO intervention brigade; and sponsoring the Kampala talks from December 2012 to December 2013 between the M23 and the Congolese government, which ultimately led to the rebel group’s surrender. It may be better, however, to shift attention and support away from the relatively narrowly focused ICGLR and towards the better-established and broader regional economic communities: SADC and the EAC. SADC could strengthen its presence in the region by, for example, completing its work to establish a liaison office in Kinshasa (and also, possibly, establishing a similar office in Goma, the capital of Congo’s fragile North Kivu province). A regional joint verification mission for the PSC Framework and a regional joint intelligence facility, one that could track non-state groups and illicit economic activity, could also help to promote peace across the Great Lakes.

International intervention in the region has met with some successes, especially through the coordinated work of the group of special envoys from South Africa, the AU, the UN, and the EU. However, over-reliance on external actors can be dangerous. Their involvement is often shaped by their own parochial interests. They may also be part of the problem – the Great Lakes region’s autocratic leaders rely on support from international backers to remain in power, and external actors have been accused of (directly or indirectly) supporting or condoning the use of force in the region. External interventions can also, intentionally or not, usurp or block local and regional projects. Links between local, national, regional, and external initiatives need to be built in which local, national, and regional actors take the lead in peacemaking efforts.

Over-reliance on external actors is fostered by the fact that regional institutions have not yet developed effective approaches to funding their programmes from their own members, or to enforcing norms of democratic governance. A commitment by the international community to reduce the footprint of some of its interventions (such as MONUSCO) might not only ease some of the tensions between national leaders and international actors, but also force a more serious conversation about how to make regional institutions better promoters of peace and prosperity in the region.
2. The Democratic Republic of the Congo

Two intertwined factors drive conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo: weak state legitimacy, and interference by its neighbours. International responses to these problems have often been limited by an unsophisticated understanding of their dynamics.

The Congolese state does not enjoy widespread legitimacy among its 68 million citizens. This is particularly problematic as planned local and presidential elections approach in October 2015 and November 2016, respectively. President Joseph Kabila is constitutionally prohibited from running for a third term, but may seek to do so, or to prolong his stay in power by delaying elections. Many observers believe that the DRC does not have the procedures and infrastructure in place to hold effective local government elections. The problems include the fact that anyone not registered in the 2011 elections will not be eligible to vote in 2015–2016, thus disenfranchising between five and eight million young people. Also, in January 2015, parliament passed a law expanding the number of provinces in the DRC from 11 to 26, at President Kabila’s urging. While this expansion was mandated by the constitution, doing it quickly – the expansion was scheduled to be completed by 30 June 2015 – is unrealistic, and could negatively affect the smooth conduct of elections. Problems in holding local government elections could also be used as a pretext to delay national elections. Heightening the concern, Kinshasa has been hardening its position. In particular, the September 2014 reorganisation of the military is interpreted by some analysts as a way of solidifying military control in advance of possible election-related unrest, and has resulted in individuals accused of abuses being placed in charge of the country’s three new “defence zones”: General Gabriel Amisi, accused of selling arms to militias (including to the Hutu-dominated Nyatura) and involvement in illicit tin-mining, was placed in charge of the western zone; General Jean-Claude Kifwa, accused of trading arms to the Mai-Mai Morgan militia in exchange for ivory, was made commander of the southern zone; and one of Kifwa’s former subordinates, General Leon Mushale Tshipamba, was given command of the eastern zone.

President Kabila’s actions have sparked opposition both from within his own party, and from Congolese civil society. For example, he proposed a national census before local government elections – an undertaking that could not have been completed in time to hold elections on schedule. Parliament, though controlled by a pro-Kabila coalition, refused to approve the census, following protests in Kinshasa in January 2015 in which at least 36 people were killed and many more arrested. The DRC could be heading for further unrest, a deepening of Kabila’s autocratic rule, or a possible military coup.

The appropriate regional and international response to this situation has many dimensions. On the one hand, any international support of the elections risks at least partly legitimising them. Deficits in President Kabila’s legitimacy go back to the first post-conflict elections in 2006, which were broadly supported by the international community, despite their imperfections. SADC, for example, acknowledged problems in the 2006 polls, but pragmatically decided that the primary goal of securing peace was best served by allowing the government to be constituted. Since then, President Kabila has consolidated a highly centralised clientelistic system that often undermines his accountability to the public, weakens security sector reform, and fosters corruption. The flawed 2011 elections, which were widely condemned but sparked little other international reaction, accelerated Kabila’s ability to build a power base that lacks broad legitimacy. If major African and international institutions refuse to send observers or other support to forthcoming elections in October 2015 and November 2016, as the European Union has signalled that it will do, this could send a clear message that Joseph Kabila’s actions in the lead-up to the polls were unacceptable and had irredeemably tainted them.

On the other hand, local government elections have already been delayed at least three times, having been previously announced for 2005, 2009, and 2013. If appropriate structures are not in place to hold them in a timely, transparent, and accurate manner, perhaps the AU, the UN, and SADC should provide “good offices”, as well as financial and technical support, to the Congolese government. This approach would have the advantage of honouring the desire for local government elections that Congolese citizens have expressed, and of actively supporting the strengthening of democracy in the DRC.

The Congo has also suffered destabilising interventions by its neighbours, particularly in the country’s eastern provinces (North and South Kivu). While violence in the eastern Congo has garnered much of the international attention, the country faces other challenges as well. For example, an estimated 583,000 people have been displaced by fighting in the southern Katanga province since 2012.

The persistent insecurity in the DRC that began with the 1996–2003 conflict has always been regionalised. Some of the largest and most dangerous militias in the Kivus, including Burundi’s National Forces of Liberation (FNL) and Uganda’s Allied Democratic Forces – National Army for the Liberation of Uganda (ADF-NALU), are tied to conflicts in neighbouring states. Many indigenous militias, such as the Mai-Mai “self-defence” forces, have also arisen in the eastern DRC, often originally in response to abuses by foreign-backed armed groups.

The primary external player in the Congo, however, is Rwanda. One of the precipitating factors of the 1996 war was the fact that Rwandan génocidaires sought refuge in the eastern Congo after they had been defeated by the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF) in 1994. Kigali has been credibly accused of supporting several of the strongest militias, including the National Congress for the Defence of the People (CNDP) and the M23. Rwanda has been able to continue its support for armed groups in the DRC in significant part because its international donors – particularly the US and the EU – have been unwilling to exert pressure on Kigali to end its destabilisation of the region. This only began to change in 2013, when strong evidence of Rwandan involvement with the M23 led the United States and several European donors to freeze military aid to the country.

Insecurity in the eastern Congo has also spurred national, regional, and global activity aimed at conflict management and resolution. The DRC and Rwanda mounted joint military operations in 2009, called Umoja Wetu, against the FDLR. The International Conference on the Great Lakes Region hosted peace talks in Kampala from December 2012 to December 2013 between the Congolese government and the M23. Since 1999, the DRC has been the theatre of one of the largest UN peacekeeping operations in the world, MONUSCO, with 20,091 uniformed personnel as of May 2015. In July 2013, MONUSCO added a SADC-led intervention brigade, the first UN force with an explicit mandate of “neutralizing armed groups”, and which has been credited, along with the Armed Forces of the DRC (FARDC), with the defeat of the M23 in November 2013.

Persistent insecurity in the Congo’s eastern provinces has also been exacerbated by limitations in international initiatives there. The international response has tended to be dominated by three assumptions: first, that the violence is primarily about national and regional conflict over the illegal exploitation of resources; second, that the worst result of the conflict is violence against women (especially sexual violence); and third, that the solution is to expand state capacity.

Locating the cause of the conflict (as opposed to a significant source of conflict financing) in mineral exploitation conceals the fact that violence in the Kivus is often driven by intensely local disputes, which are more often over land or about who will hold local and traditional offices, than about mineral exploitation. Even the ability of regional actors to attract combatants to their proxies is often tied to the resources that such actors can provide locals with in order to gain the upper hand in internal conflicts with rivals. For example, the Congolese Tutsi (such as the Banyamulenge of the South Kivu highlands), who are the main recruits to pro-Rwandan armed groups, have been involved in land and citizenship disputes with their neighbours since the 1930s. International approaches that focus solely on curtailing illegal mineral exploitation cannot therefore deal effectively with these drivers of conflict. Similarly, efforts at security sector reform and improving civil-military relations need to be addressed not only at the national level, but also in terms of local relationships between citizens and security forces. Addressing local drivers of conflict requires understanding local disputes and providing alternative economic opportunities for individuals who might otherwise join armed groups. State illegitimacy exacerbates these problems, as the patronage networks maintained by the government in Kinshasa give it little incentive to engage with local stakeholders outside these networks.

Unfortunately, deeply ingrained perspectives and procedures in international institutions make it difficult to convince international donors to invest sufficient resources in local efforts. International approaches to the Congolese conflict have, however, been slowly realising the need to focus more on local, “bottom-up” conflicts and to support local conflict resolution efforts with financial, logistical, and technical assistance. For example, the East African Court of Justice (EACJ) has cooperated with civil society organisations in Uganda to promote human rights.\(^{26}\) In addition, the Swiss government’s programme Tujenge Amani! (Swahili for “build peace”) in South Kivu’s Kalehe territory – aimed at reducing violence by the Raia Mutomboki militia – has succeeded in demobilising about 600 fighters and promoting cooperation between the FARDC, traditional leaders, religious leaders, and civil society.\(^{27}\) The Life and Peace Institute, a Swedish non-governmental organisation (NGO), has also worked with Congolese partners – Action for Endogenous Development and Peace (ADEPAE), and the Organisational Innovation Network (RIO) – to hold intercommunity fora that reduce friction over seasonal cattle migration in South Kivu, among other locally focused projects.\(^{28}\) The Dutch government (among other donors) has also supported the creation of decentralised land registration systems in Burundi.\(^{29}\)

The single-minded international focus on sex- and gender-based violence in the Congo, though clearly a genuine problem – a 2014 survey conducted in the North Kivu province found that 47 per cent of men surveyed had used violence against an intimate partner\(^ {30}\) – can sometimes be counter-productive. Armed actors have learned that violence against women is an effective tactic for gaining international attention, which can be parlayed into more lucrative incentives to lay down their arms. Emphasis on the victimisation of women can also divert attention and resources from other kinds of abuses, such as violence (including sexual violence) against men, and can inadvertently play into problematic international views of Congolese society as inherently violent.

Finally, bolstering state capabilities in eastern Congo without resolving issues of legitimacy may only increase resentment and local support for non-state actors. For example, since the Congolese military is one of the armed actors implicated in human rights abuses, increasing its capacity risks facilitating these abuses.\(^ {31}\) Critics of the internationally backed approach to stabilisation in the eastern Congo have also raised concerns about whether the UN’s counterinsurgency-derived “islands of stability” strategy will lead to consolidation of the protection of areas that are already relatively safe and favoured by the government in Kinshasa and external actors, at the expense of the most vulnerable populations.\(^ {32}\)

Ending insecurity and improving governance in the DRC will require a combination of top-down and bottom-up approaches to the conflict, with SADC a key actor in these efforts. International supporters of regional governments must therefore be willing to use their leverage to end support for armed groups in the Congo, and should also explore better ways to address human rights abuses, such as targeted sanctions, “naming and shaming” particular perpetrators of abuses, or pursuing a more comprehensive and even-handed strategy of prosecutions by the Hague-based International Criminal Court (ICC). At the same time, while it would be a mistake to focus entirely on local conflicts, more effective ways must be found for external actors to facilitate the resolution of micro-scale conflicts by acting in advisory and support (financial, logistical, or technical) roles to local NGOs.
3. Burundi

The crisis in Burundi has centred on Pierre Nkurunziza’s bid for a third presidential term. But the situation has roots in deeper problems of the country’s political system.

In May 2015, Burundi was scheduled to hold legislative and communal elections, followed by a first-round of presidential polls a month later. These would be the third elections since the 2000 Arusha agreement that formally ended the phase of the country’s civil war that started in 1993 and killed an estimated 300,000 people. (The last armed faction in Burundi, the National Forces of Liberation, did not lay down its arms until 2006.) In large part due to an opposition boycott in the 2010 elections, President Pierre Nkurunziza’s National Council for the Defence of Democracy – Forces for the Defence of Democracy (CNDD-FDD) has dominated the government, and has since sought to consolidate its power and shrink the space for dissent and democratic participation.

Nkurunziza formally announced on 25 April 2015 that he planned to take advantage of an ambiguity in the constitution to run for a third presidential term, in violation of the Arusha agreement. Article 96 of Burundi’s 2005 constitution specifies that the president is to be elected by direct universal suffrage for a five-year term, renewable once. Article 302, however, provides for the election of the first post-transition president by a vote of the National Assembly and Senate. President Nkurunziza’s supporters have argued before the Constitutional Court that, because he was not directly elected to his first term, these five years did not count against the Article 96 limit. Others, however, have noted that it is not plausible that this could have been the intention of the constitution’s drafters. They argue that Article 302’s indirect election was included to smooth the transition from Burundi’s long experience with military rule and civil war. The 2000 Arusha agreement also states unambiguously that no president may serve more than two terms.

Reaction to the constitutional claim has been mixed. For example, in March 2015, Burundi’s Catholic Church announced its opposition to a third term, regardless of the Constitutional Court’s decision. In April 2015, the African Union Peace and Security Council called for the Court’s decision to be respected. A month later, the Court ruled in favour of Nkurunziza. Its vice-president, Sylvère Nimpagaritse, however, fled to Rwanda, claiming that the decision had been made under duress. International observers – such as the chair of the AU Commission, Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, and the United States Permanent Representative to the UN, Samantha Power – have since criticised the Court’s decision.

The current crisis indicates deeper problems in the political and social arrangements that have prevailed in Burundi since the end of the country’s civil war by 2005. The Arusha agreement of 2000 is widely regarded to have been a success. Even with the recent unrest, Burundi is safer for its 10 million inhabitants today than it was two decades ago: more people have access to resources to live decent lives; ethnicity is no longer the main cleavage in society (for example, both the ruling CNDD-FDD and the largest opposition party, the FNL, were associated with Hutu elements during the civil war); the military and police have been ethnically integrated and significantly reformed; and presidential and parliamentary elections were successfully held in 2005 and 2010. Women have also been mobilising for peace in Burundi since at least the July 2000 All-Party Burundi Women’s Peace Conference.

But the CNDD-FDD has never appeared to hold the Arusha agreement in high regard. It refused to sign in 2000, and only ended its armed opposition to the accord three years later. Arusha formed the basis for the agreement between the transitional government and the CNDD-FDD, but this was apparently only because the rebel group had no alternative. Nkurunziza’s bid for a third presidential term, as well as other laws restricting political and media freedom passed during the CNDD-FDD’s ten years in power – such as a 2011 law that gave Burundi’s government the power to interfere with the operations of political parties, and laws passed in 2013 that heavily restricted public demonstrations and media freedoms – could be seen as part of a sustained attack on the basic power-sharing system established by Arusha, and an attempt to create a de facto one-party state. The ruling party’s political manoeuvres have also exacerbated tensions over land issues, affecting livelihoods, food security, and the resettlement of the 72,499 refugees from Burundi and 52,946 internally displaced persons (IDPs) in the country as of December 2014, originating from the civil war and previous unrest. A 2013 law expanded the scope of the National Commission on Land and Other Assets (CNTB) in a way that critics charged favoured the CNDD-FDD’s political allies and members of the Hutu ethnic group, leading to violent opposition in south-eastern Burundi and the suspension of CNTB decisions in March 2015. The much-delayed Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) has also been politicised. Part of the Arusha agreement, the TRC was finally established in April 2014, and its members were elected in December 2014 amid an opposition boycott.

However, it is not just the CNDD-FDD that has expressed opposition to Arusha. The FNL, led by Agathon Rwasa, also continued fighting until 2006, after rejecting the Arusha accord. Rwasa then fled to the DRC after the 2010 elections, and his FNL restarted paramilitary operations in both the DRC and Burundi, drawing the Burundian military back into the Congolese conflict. Rwasa has since returned to Burundi to run for political office, but a faction of the FNL remains active in the DRC, and was targeted by MONUSCO in January 2015. Any analysis of the situation in Burundi must avoid construing Nkurunziza as one-dimensionally bad, or those who oppose him as one-dimensionally good. One issue that is often lost in discussions of punitive measures is that both the democratic structures in Burundi, and its main parties, are young institutions that could benefit as much from support as from being held responsible to strong regional and international democratic norms.
President Nkurunziza's third-term bid also appears to be a response to divisions within his ruling CNDD-FDD party. Burundi provides an interesting case for the region's ethnic divides. Friction between members of the Hutu and Tutsi ethnic groups has been a factor in violence and gross human rights abuses in Burundi, Rwanda, and the DRC. Arusha, in an attempt to defuse ethnic tensions, established ethnic power-sharing in the post-conflict government through, for example, a requirement to institute ethnically mixed party lists.\(^47\) However, while ethnicity was a major factor in the war, and continues to be one in current Burundian social divisions, it was far from the only one, and current conflicts often cut across ethnic divides.\(^48\) The dominant position of the CNDD-FDD, combined with a need for parties to broaden their ethnic membership, led to opportunists with no deep loyalty to the party or its leadership joining after 2004, thus exacerbating existing divisions. Nkurunziza has maintained a tight inner circle within the party, made up primarily of ex-fighters and "securocrats", and has turned to coercive tactics to maintain his position. For example, former CNDD-FDD party chair Hussein Radjabu was arrested in April 2007 after a political rift with Nkurunziza, though he escaped from prison in March 2015. Radjabu's current whereabouts are unclear, though shortly after his release he claimed to be "living among the Burundian people".\(^49\) These dynamics make the stakes over a third presidential term extremely high for Nkurunziza and his circle personally, and make it more difficult for him gracefully and safely to step down from office.

Some in the party have come to view Nkurunziza as a political liability. A leaked February 2015 memo by the intelligence service and a March 2015 letter from 17 party leaders both urged him to step down.\(^50\) While Nkurunziza has never been popular in the capital of Bujumbura, there have been recent reports that his popularity is slipping in the countryside as well, with 62 per cent of people nationwide reportedly opposing a third presidential term.\(^9\) In rural areas, Nkurunziza had been praised for popular projects such as building schools and football stadiums, and promoting maternal health programmes. However, the Catholic Church’s criticism of Nkurunziza carries great weight with its members, who constitute about 70 per cent of Burundi’s population of 10 million.\(^52\) Politicisation of the country’s land court has also been a major issue in rural areas, and the countryside has seen a rise in “ethnic discourse” (noticeable, for example, to observers of social media).

The political opposition is also divided, thus limiting its effectiveness. It was severely weakened by the decision of most opposition parties to boycott the 2010 presidential and parliamentary elections. This led to exile for some opposition leaders (such as Agathon Rwasa), arrest for others (such as François Nyamoa of the Movement for Solidarity and Democracy [MSDI]), and little meaningful opposition representation in the government. The CNDD-FDD has used its dominant political position to intimidate and fragment the opposition. One tactic, for example, has been to employ Burundi’s electoral laws to allow the government to recognise dissident factions within opposition parties as the official leadership of these parties, as was the case with the Union for National Progress (UPRONA) in January 2014.\(^53\) The opposition has been further weakened by gerrymandered electoral districts, alleged irregularities in the party registration process, and reported threats against citizens who register... for opposition parties. Burundi’s electoral commission also issued a ruling in August 2014 prohibiting anyone with a pending lawsuit against them from standing for election, which would bar at least two important opposition candidates – Agathon Rwasa (no longer head of the FNL, but running as an independent) and Frédéric Bamvuginymvira (Sahwanya – Front for Democracy in Burundi [FRODEBU]) – from running.

The CNDD-FDD has shown itself willing to use coercive tactics against the population, even before the crackdown on protests. Its Imbonerakure youth wing has long been accused of violence, especially in rural areas. The CNDD-FDD has been accused by both civil society and the UN of arming the Imbonerakure, and executing captured rebels. As earlier noted, insecurity in Burundi has generated large refugee flows, numbering about 144,000 people by June 2015, into neighbouring countries. A complete collapse of the 2000 Arusha accord would exacerbate inter-communal conflict, particularly over access to economic resources (importantly, but not limited to, land).

The African and broader international community has been engaged in Burundi, but has tended to focus on stabilisation and crisis response, to the detriment of human rights and long-term democratic governance – in part from a desire not to upset a fragile peacebuilding process. The Special Envoy of the UN Secretary-General for the Great Lakes Region, Said Djinnit, had been engaged in talks with members of the government, opposition parties, and civil society. However, President Nkurunziza was accused of offering as “concessions” issues that should not have been open to discussion, such as the release of people imprisoned for non-violent protest, restoration of the ability of radio stations to operate as long as they agreed not to report live from protests, and a promise not to run for a fourth presidential term. The East African Community’s representatives on the ground (such as a May 2015 fact-finding mission led by Tanzania’s foreign minister, Bernard Membe) have been focused on removing obstacles to the polls going forward, so they may be conducted in a free and fair manner. At a July 2015 summit, while the EAC criticised the June 2015 parliamentary and local elections, it called for Nkurunziza to remain in power while recommending that the planned July 2015 presidential elections be delayed to ensure that these polls could be “free, fair, peaceful, and credible”.

Africa has institutions that could be used to address the situation in Burundi diplomatically, such as the African Union and its Panel of the Wise. However, so far, these bodies have been unable to take effective action. The AU in particular has been criticised for not taking a stronger stance towards Nkurunziza’s actions through its special envoys (until April 2015, Malian diplomat Boubacar Diarra, and thereafter Ibrahima Fall). AU Commission chair Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma has appealed to the regional leadership of the EAC in deference to the principle of subsidiarity, according to which regional organisations should be the first to act, where possible. In March 2015, she travelled to Burundi to meet with President Nkurunziza, as well as with women and other civil society leaders. Dlamini-Zuma reiterated that the CNDD-FDD had the primary responsibility for maintaining peace in the country, and called for a postponement of the elections, then scheduled for May 2015. She also asked the country’s Constitutional Court to consider the political, as well as the legal, implications of a third presidential term, and arranged for an independent advisory opinion from the AU Office of the Legal Counsel, headed by Vincent Nmehielle. However, at the time of the AU chair’s visit, Nkurunziza had not declared his intention to seek a third presidential term, nor had elections taken place. Invoking AU provisions on unconstitutional changes of government and suspending Burundi from membership, or seeking other sanctions through the AU Peace and Security Council, would therefore have been premature.

4. Regional Actors: Rwanda and Uganda

The aggressive foreign policies of Rwanda and Uganda towards the region, particularly their support for armed groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, have contributed to instability in the Great Lakes.

While it is easier to criticise them when they violate the sovereignty of other countries, respect for sovereignty should not continue to deflect attention from domestic repression in both countries. Uganda and Rwanda are formally multi-party democracies with elections approaching in 2016 and 2017, respectively. However, they are both effectively dominated by a single party, with long-serving leaders, Yoweri Museveni and Paul Kagame, who have taken steps to restrict effective internal dissent in their respective countries.58

Rwanda

In only 21 years since the 1994 genocide, Rwanda has become touted as an example of successful development and an “island of stability” in a troubled region. However, its gains in areas such as the provision of public services for its 12 million citizens mask the fact that its stability is based largely on fear. While some Rwandan officials pay lip service to democracy, others argue that suppressing freedom of expression prevents the resurgence of ethnic violence.59 But the government restricts much expression and political activity that is unrelated to the genocide or to ethnic hatred. Fear of genocide thus often appears to be a pretext for maintaining control.

The Rwandan government has shown itself willing to use violence to stifle dissent. For example, in May 1998, the first post-war interior minister, Seth Sendashonga, was killed in Nairobi, Kenya, after he tried to found a new opposition group. More recently, in January 2014, Patrick Karegeya, a former head of intelligence, was murdered in Johannesburg, South Africa. In both assassinations, involvement of the Rwandan government was suspected.60 The Rwandan state has also allegedly been involved with many “disappearances”, a reported 30 in 2014 alone. Some victims reappear after weeks or months, many allege torture, and some are tried for collaboration with the FDLR.61

These acts of apparent political violence take place in a broader context of repression. Paul Kagame reportedly won his last two presidential elections with more than 90 per cent of the vote, and the Rwandan Patriotic Front routinely commands more than 70 per cent of the parliamentary vote. Officially recognised political parties tend to be part of the RPF coalition (such as the Party for Progress and Concord), or at least often support the government politically (such as the Social Democratic Party). Parties that have mounted genuine opposition are targeted for repression. In 2010, three new parties attempted to contest the presidential election: the Social Party (PS)-Imberakuri, the United Democratic Forces (FDU)-Inkingi, and the Democratic Green Party. André Kagwa Rwiserera of the Democratic Green Party was killed in July 2010, but no one was held to account for his murder. Critics of the government believe it was a political assassination. Victoire Ingabire and Joseph Ntawagundi of the Democratic Green Party, and Bernard Ntaganda of the PS-Imberakuri, faced beatings and periods of imprisonment. None of the parties ultimately ran candidates. Ingabire was sentenced to eight years in prison for “terrorism” and “genocide denial” in October 2012, a sentence that was increased to 15 years after her appeal was dismissed in December 2013.

Civil society in Rwanda has also been stifled through a combination of government intimidation and infiltration. Nearly all the leading human rights activists have left the country – the only significant human rights group still active in Rwanda is the regional group Human Rights League in the Great Lakes Region (LDGL). Remaining civil society groups mostly engage in uncontroversial service delivery tasks, such as childhood education.

Most independent journalists have also been forced into silence or exile. In April 2010, two of the most popular independent newspapers, Umuseso and Umuvugizi, were suspended for inciting public disorder, and their leadership sued and exiled. Jean-Léonard Rugambage of Umuvugizi was killed in June 2010. In October 2014, the government suspended the British Broadcasting Corporation’s (BBC) Kinyarwanda service, one of the most popular radio services in the country, in response to a BBC documentary, Rwanda’s Untold Story, that the Kagame administration claims amounted to “genocide denial”. The remaining media are pro-government, and have been publishing sycophantic articles about Kagame that seem to be laying the groundwork for him to run for a third presidential term in 2017. However, private radio stations have begun hosting call-in programmes on which more sensitive issues are discussed.

The possibility of Kagame running for a third term in 2017 (which would require forcing through a change of Rwanda’s constitution) is being presented as the “will of the people”. But in a context in which the basic building blocks of democracy – such as freedom of speech and the spirit of independent thought – are not in place, it is not clear how this could genuinely be the case. Despite these abuses, international criticism of Kagame has been muted compared to the reaction to Burundian leader Pierre Nkurunziza’s third-term bid.

Donor governments have been, until recently, unwilling to criticise Rwanda, partly due to guilt over international failures during the genocide of 1994, in which about 800,000 people were killed. This has been changing with respect to Rwanda’s involvement in the DRC. But international donors are still largely reluctant to criticise

Kagame’s internal repression. Criticism of Kigali will have a limited impact so long as African leaders do not speak out as well – foreign voices are not as effective as grassroots, national, and regional ones. This may make it more sensible to look to the leadership of an African power like South Africa to speak out rather than relying solely on the broader international community, if the aim is to achieve internal democratic reform in Rwanda.

Uganda

In 1996, Uganda was part of the coalition that supported rebel forces against the Western-backed dictatorship of Mobutu Sese Seko in the DRC. Many allies in that coalition intended to open regional space for democracy, but Rwanda and Uganda sought to pursue their narrow economic and strategic interests. The alliance between Rwanda and Uganda fell apart early in the 1998–2003 phase of the war, and their rift led to three military clashes in Kisangani in 1999 and 2000 in which hundreds of Congolese were killed.68 It also resulted in violence between their proxies in the DRC, starting with the split between the pro-Kigali Congolese Rally for Democracy–Goma (RCD-G) and the pro-Kampala RCD-Kisangani (RCD-K) in May 1999, though the rift between Rwanda and Uganda has recently shown signs of healing. Yoweri Museveni’s ostensible reasons for the war were to deny rear bases to Ugandan rebels and to protect his country from invasion by the DRC. But the main reason for Kampala’s continued interventions in the Congo may be economic exploitation. This, at least, was the explanation of a 2005 International Court of Justice (ICJ) ruling requiring Uganda to pay reparations to the DRC, and the implication of the 2002 final report of the United Nations panel of experts on the illegal exploitation of natural resources in the Congo.69

Uganda has played the role of both “arsonist” and “fire-fighter” in the region. For example, in December 1999, Kampala brought together several rebel factions in the DRC in a bid to resolve their differences. These were the RCD-G, the RDC-K, and the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (MLC), the latter two of which were Ugandan allies.70 Similarly, while Museveni was chair of the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region between January 2012 and January 2014, he hosted the Kampala talks under the auspices of which M23 fighters eventually laid down their arms in December 2013. Along with Rwanda, however, Uganda had earlier been implicated in supporting the M23. Kampala’s problematic role in the region is facilitated by the fact that most regional and international initiatives are ad hoc, and the capacity of regional mechanisms to promote effective conflict management needs urgently to be strengthened. Uganda’s involvement fills the vacuum left by regional institutions.

Formally, Uganda’s 38 million citizens have many political freedoms, but most of the country’s political mechanisms are dysfunctional, and the government has sometimes acted in repressive ways towards the political opposition, and in restricting press freedom.71 Uganda has a strong civil society and outspoken political parties, but they are at a disadvantage relative to the government’s organisational capacity and resources to co-opt and intimidate its opponents. As with Rwanda, while Uganda’s regional role has been increasingly criticised, powerful Western actors have been largely silent about internal repression as protesters have been intimidated, beaten, and tear-gassed. However, both Rwanda and Uganda rely on international donors for between 19 and 40 per cent of their national budgets, thus providing these external actors with leverage.

Uganda’s foreign policy is often driven by Museveni’s decisions, without a clear and coherent strategy. For example, in an August 1999 address to the Ugandan parliament, he made clear that intervening in the DRC was not a matter of national consensus, but a decision he had made in consultation with only a few military commanders. As he noted in that address, the “decision … was taken by the Army High Command” and later approved by the Army Council.

5. Regional Actors: South Africa, the Southern African Development Community, and the African Union

Continental actors from outside the region — or whose membership extends beyond the region — notably South Africa, SADC, and the AU, have long played an active role in the Great Lakes.

For example, the African Union began deploying the first wholly African peacekeeping operation, AMIB, in Burundi in February 2003; South Africa was instrumental to the dialogue that created a new Congolese government in July 2003; and the MONUSCO intervention brigade deployed from August 2013, was credited with progress against rebel groups in the eastern Congo, and remains led and staffed by SADC personnel.

South Africa and the Southern African Development Community

South Africa has long played a role in peacebuilding efforts in the Great Lakes region. In Burundi, President Nelson Mandela took over the facilitation of the Arusha peace process in 1999 after the death of the former president of Tanzania, Julius Nyerere. South Africa’s deputy president (now president), Jacob Zuma, succeeded him in 2002. The country sent 700 troops to protect returning politicians from exile assuming their posts in the transitional government after the peace deal,75 and was instrumental in the creation of the African Union Mission in Burundi in 2003.76

Under president Thabo Mbeki, Tshwane (Pretoria) hosted the inter-Congolese dialogue at Sun City from 2002, which led to the adoption of a transitional constitution for the DRC in 2003. President Mandela had also unsuccessfully sought to mediate an end to the Congolese war in a direct meeting between Mobutu Sese Seko and Laurent Kabila in May 1997. South Africa has had a Special Envoy to the Great Lakes since 1996, when Welile Nhlapo was appointed Special Envoy to Burundi, a position that was expanded to cover the entire region, and in which he served until 2000. Later, Kingsley Mamabolo served in the position from 2006 to 2009. He was succeeded by Dumisani Khumalo, before Nhlapo’s second tenure, from 2011 to 2013. Eddy Maloka has filled the role since 2013. Tshwane maintains observer status at the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region as well as having two military officers on the ICGLR joint verification mechanism. Under the auspices of the South Africa–DRC binational commission, established by the February 2004 general cooperation agreement between the two countries, South Africa has signed over 36 bilateral agreements with the DRC covering various fields, including capacity-building in defence, police, justice, elections, and public service reform. Tshwane has also signed the Trilateral Mechanism on Dialogue and Cooperation between Angola, the DRC, and South Africa, towards the achievement of security, stability, democratic governance, and development in the region. In February 2013, South Africa was one of the signatories to the Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework. It was also one of the key architects of the 3,000-strong SADC-led MONUSCO intervention brigade, in which its troops serve alongside personnel from Tanzania and Malawi, and which was instrumental in the defeat of the M23 in November 2013.

South Africa’s approaches to Burundi and the DRC reflect a model of peacebuilding derived from its largely successful transition to majority rule. In both countries, Tshwane promoted inter-communal dialogue and a transitional government characterised by power-sharing between belligerent factions. The successes (or failures) of post-conflict regimes in the Great Lakes therefore have implications for South Africa’s image as a continental leader.

South Africa’s role as an “honest broker” in the Great Lakes region has sometimes been questioned, given its economic interests there. A government with direct national interests could be tempted to act in pursuit of these interests, rather than to pursue peace impartially. However, a government with direct interests in a region is also likely to have greater commitment than an actor whose interests are not directly threatened by instability. In addition, Tshwane’s influence over Kinshasa is sometimes overstated. For example, while South Africa consulted with the DRC over the latter’s upcoming revisions of its provincial structures, these conversations were limited to discussing South Africa’s own experiences with decentralisation after the end of apartheid in 1994 and suggesting that the economic dominance of mineral-rich Katanga could be reduced by creating several provinces from it.

Perhaps most significant, South Africa maintains that it understands its involvement in the Great Lakes region as a member of SADC. The organisation’s involvement in the Great Lakes dates back to 1997, when the DRC became a member with strong support from South Africa. SADC’s collective security provisions were invoked to send Zimbabwean, Angolan, and Namibian troops to the Congo to defend the government of President Laurent Kabila in 1998. Starting with about 600 Zimbabwean and 1,500 Angolan troops in August 1998, by December 2000 there were an estimated 11,000 Zimbabwean military personnel, about 2,500 Angolans, and about 2,000 Namibians in the DRC. South Africa and Botswana, however, challenged the depiction of the force as a SADC one. Joyce Banda, who was then SADC chair and president of Malawi, along with Yoweri Museveni, then chair of the IGCLR and president of Uganda, signed the final joint communiqué of the Kampala talks that formally ended the M23 rebellion in December 2013. A month earlier, SADC and the IGCLR had held a joint summit in Tshwane to discuss the disarmament of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda. This summit was followed by a joint ministerial meeting in the Angolan capital of Luanda in July 2014, at which a six-month deadline for FDLR disarmament was agreed. As of February 2015, the United Nations reported that 339 FDLR combatants had voluntarily disarmed alongside 119 of their dependents.

79 CCR, Post-Apartheid South Africa’s Foreign Policy After Two Decades, seminar report, Cape Town, June 2014.
Concern over South Africa’s role in the sub-region centred on the Inga III Dam, planned as the first phase of the Grand Inga Dam project on the Congo River. In November 2011, the governments of South Africa and the DRC signed a memorandum of understanding that ultimately led to an October 2013 treaty under which South Africa agreed to buy 2,500 megawatts of Inga III’s expected 4,800 megawatts of hydroelectric output. Critics charge that this deal disproportionately benefits South Africa, and that the timing of the memorandum was suspiciously close to the November 2011 Congolese elections – polls that South Africa was one of few countries to have certified as having been “successful”.

However, South African president Jacob Zuma made his statement on the 2011 elections only after receiving a positive report from the SADC observer mission.84 In addition, the joint statement by the African Union, SADC, the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS), the ICGLR, and the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (COMESA) observer missions also declared the elections to have been successful, and called for the results to be respected.85 While South Africa is set to consume more than half of the planned output of the Inga III Dam, it views the project as beneficial for Southern Africa as a whole. Tshwane argues that it signed the memorandum with Kinshasa not because it plans to dominate the project – it could not finance the project alone even if it so desired – but because such a project needs a lead nation to spearhead it, and South Africa is well positioned to play this role.

The African Union

There has been significant concern over respect for the sovereignty of states in the Great Lakes region, though sovereignty has sometimes been invoked by some African governments to protect incumbent autocratic regimes. This is why the AU’s Constitutive Act of 2000 has sought to limit the applicability of sovereignty by permitting the organisation to intervene in cases of gross human rights abuses and incidents likely to result in regional instability.

The African Union has also been an active player in the Great Lakes region for more than a decade. In 2003, it deployed the African Union Mission in Burundi, the first peacekeeping mission wholly planned and executed by members of the continental body. The 3,335-strong mission was led by South Africa and also involved troops from Mozambique and Ethiopia, as well as military observers from Burkina Faso, Gabon, Mali, Togo, and Tunisia.86 More recently, in November 2012, the AU appointed Malian diplomat Boubacar Diarra as Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region. In October 2013, AU Commission chair Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma made an official visit to the DRC in support of the Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework. In June 2015, Diarra was succeeded by Ibrahima Fall, the former UN Special Representative for the Great Lakes Region.

Since May 2013, the AU and the UN have jointly convened a regional oversight mechanism for the Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework. The 15-member AU Peace and Security Council has prioritised the situation as well, issuing a decision in February 2015 expressing concern about the rift between MONUSCO and the Congolese army in operations against the FDLR. While much external attention to the situation in the Great Lakes has been security-focused, the AU Peace and Security Council also noted the importance of economic growth and poverty reduction to the long-term future of the region, welcoming the private investment conference held by the UN, the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region, and the government of Angola, in December 2014. Beyond the DRC, as earlier noted above, the AU Mission in Burundi was deployed in 2003, and the continental body maintains an office in Burundi. During his tenure as AU special envoy, Diarra had expressed concerns about the political deadlock between the ruling CNDD-FDD and the opposition UPRONA, while the AU has repeatedly reiterated its support for the Arusha agreement.

Constructive dialogue among international actors in the region is important for establishing a common approach, but all actors in the Great Lakes need to recognise four “inconvenient truths” about international involvement in the region.

First, the international community often acts as if more money automatically buys a better solution to conflicts. Second, external actors tend to focus disproportionately on military analyses of the region’s problems and hence often search for military solutions. This mistakes a symptom – armed non-state actors – for the root causes of the problem, such as lack of socio-economic development, poor governance, and manipulation of ethnicity. Third, a major cause of the region’s problems is that it has often been the victim of realpolitik – powerful national and international actors have pursued their own parochial interests with little concern for the interests or perspectives of the region’s citizens. This includes organisations involved in the “industry of conflict”. Businesses that profit from the economic access that conflict provides, as well as some governments and aid agencies, sometimes have little incentive in seeing the conflicts actually resolved. Finally, while international actors often look for ready-made solutions to conflicts, resolving the issues in the Great Lakes region will require close attention to the needs of its citizens, which are varied and complicated. The international community’s limited tool-kit of sticks and carrots is often inadequate. For example, incentives applied at the state level may not address the fact that corruption and limited economic opportunities have left many youth in the region (more than 30 per cent of the regional population were aged between 10 and 24 as of 2013) feeling as if they do not have a stake in its future. There is a particular need for new, more effective approaches to resource management in the region. It should not be assumed that “more effective” necessarily means stronger enforcement. An inventory should be undertaken of other resource regimes so that their strengths and weaknesses can be assessed. It may turn out that a more effective conflict management system in the Great Lakes region will have more to do with the coordination and/or consolidation of existing tools.

Despite some critics calling for the dissolution of the ICGLR, the AU regards the body as still having an important role to play in the region. The conference was key to the resolution of the stalemate that continued after the signing of the Lusaka ceasefire agreement in 1999. The states that neighbour the DRC – including Rwanda and Uganda – had security concerns over withdrawing their troops and proxy forces from the country. Only the promise of both an interposition force to maintain security and a long-term platform (the ICGLR) for the discussion of governance and socio-economic issues in the region convinced them to withdraw by 2002, though they continued to intervene sporadically and to loot the Congo’s resources.

Both the United Nations and the European Union have had a significant presence in the Great Lakes region for decades, but both are now facing limits to their ability to influence the situation there, due to a combination of organisational constraints on action, resistance from regional governments, and the need for external actors to play a supporting role while allowing regional and continental actors to lead.

While the discussion here focuses on the UN and the EU, other external actors such as China, the New Development Bank of the Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa (BRICS) bloc, and the US should also be kept in mind.

The United Nations

In July 2014, the UN appointed Said Djinnit as its Special Envoy to the Great Lakes Region, replacing Ireland’s Mary Robinson, the first UN Great Lakes envoy, who had served in the position since March 2013. As with the AU, a key focus of the UN envoy’s work is to support the Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework.

The United Nations is institutionally complex and cannot be regarded as a unitary actor. Peacekeeping operations may have mandatory obligations that they are not well-resourced or well-designed to fulfil. The 20,000-strong United Nations Organisation Stabilisation Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, for example, is mandated to support local elections in the DRC, despite the fact that the required resources – from both the UN and Kinshasa – would be at least comparable to the investment in the Congo’s first elections in 2006, which cost about $500 million.90 MONUSCO is also mandated to monitor the arms embargo, which it does not have the capacity to do.91

Nor is the UN Security Council the only place where political interests are at play in peacekeeping mandates. Because troop and police contributions to UN peacekeeping operations are voluntary, the world body must be sensitive to the interests of large contributors whose withdrawal could threaten ongoing and future operations. For example, an August 2010 UN report accused the Rwandan military and Kigali-backed rebel groups of human rights violations in the eastern Congo during the 1996–2003 conflict.92 At the time the report was released in October 2010, Rwanda was the eighth largest contributor to UN peacekeeping operations, and had threatened to withdraw all of its personnel from these missions if the report was made public without revision. The document (including the accusations against Rwanda and its proxies) was only released after being leaked to the press, and after the UN Secretary-General, Ban Ki-moon, had personally travelled to Kigali to discuss it with Paul Kagame, and allowed Rwanda to include a reply in the final release.93 As of May 2015, Rwanda was the fifth largest contributor to UN peacekeeping operations, and Kigali seems to have pursued greater contributions to UN missions in part to achieve this kind of influence. Rwanda also served on the UN Security Council between 2013 and 2014, at a time when it was accused of destabilising the Great Lakes region.

The UN’s presence in any individual country is also multifaceted, which may limit the ways in which resources can be deployed. Its member states are required to pay their share of the peacekeeping budget, while contributions to UN agencies that operate projects alongside peacekeeping missions (such as humanitarian assistance) are typically voluntary. This means that peacekeepers are often much better-resourced than other elements of the UN presence. While everyone recognises in principle that an active civilian component is necessary to complement military efforts in order to address insecurity, peacekeepers are heavily military-focused and tend to use their resources on the mission itself rather than for post-conflict reconstruction efforts. In the 2014–2015 fiscal year, for example, MONUSCO was only budgeted for $7 million in “quick-impact projects” – small humanitarian and infrastructure projects intended to build good will for the mission – while the rest of its $1.4 billion 2014–2015 budget was designated for operational costs.94

The UN, however, faces more pressing challenges in the Great Lakes region. As of February 2015, its military operations in the DRC were effectively halted. The immediate cause was Kinshasa’s decision to put two commanders – Fall Sikabwe and Bruno Mandevu – who had been “red-listed” by the UN over allegations of human rights abuses, in charge of the Congolese army’s anti-FDLR operations. These operations were intended to be the next campaign for the SADC-led intervention brigade. While the UN ban technically only applied to joint operations with the red-listed commanders, military cooperation in general was affected by the dispute.

Some observers believe that the Congolese government chose the commanders of its anti-FDLR operations so as to provoke a confrontation with the world body. In January 2010, president Joseph Kabila had signalled that he would formally ask the UN operation to leave the country. A joint working group established by the government and the UN to assess security conditions was originally intended by Kinshasa to develop an “exit strategy” for the UN Organisation Mission in the DRC, as the mission was then named. However, the UN was able to negotiate for a reorganisation from MONUC to MONUSCO instead, which involved a draw-down of 2,000 troops, redeployment of the 19,000 remaining UN personnel to concentrate them in the eastern Kivu provinces, and revisions to the mandate that emphasised the primary role of the Congolese government.95 The UN is again facing a government in Kinshasa that is ambivalent about its presence and has called for a reduction of 7,000 personnel out of 20,000 peacekeepers. In addition, pressure from major UN funders – led by the US, which is currently assessed at 28 per cent of the UN’s peacekeeping budget – to reduce peacekeeping spending, led to the insertion of language devoted to an “exit strategy” in the MONUSCO mandate in March 2013.96 Reports of renewed activity in the eastern Congo by Rwanda, Uganda, and their allied militias indicate that neighbouring states were aware that the rift between the UN and Kinshasa had hampered MONUSCO’s smooth operation, and that Kigali and Kampala could have been looking to take advantage of this situation.

It will be difficult to resolve these tensions as long as the debate over President Joseph Kabila’s third term, and hence the legitimacy of his government, remains unresolved. Any final decisions on MONUSCO’s future may thus need to be deferred, but consultations are urgent. The only way forward is likely to be a unified front from all international stakeholders in the DRC. This would involve not just the UN, but also the AU, regional institutions such as SADC and the ICGLR, and major international donors. A concrete roadmap will need to be clearly and unequivocally endorsed by all major stakeholders and communicated not only to the government of the DRC, but also to the governments of its neighbours.

The UN has faced challenges in Burundi as well, even before the onset of the current crisis. The world body has had a presence in Burundi since 1993, most recently as the UN Office in Burundi (BNUB, 2011–2014). The country was one of the first recipients of support from the UN Peacebuilding Fund, and is the largest single recipient of such funds – nearly $62 million as of February 2015. These funds were used, among other things, to establish the Independent National Commission on Human Rights (CNIDH) and to support dialogues between the country’s political parties in 2013. The UN Peacebuilding Commission also has a country-specific configuration for Burundi, which held its first meeting in October 2006. However, following tensions with the Burundian government, the UN closed BNUB in December 2014, at the request of the government in Bujumbura. UN operations in Burundi are now coordinated by the country team, including the UN Electoral Observation Mission in Burundi (MENUB), the mandate of which will expire after the 2015 elections, currently scheduled to extend through delayed presidential polls in July 2015. Whether the UN Peacebuilding Commission will remain engaged with Burundi past the elections is also in question.

In both Burundi and the DRC, UN officials have been expelled for criticising alleged government abuses: in April 2014, Bujumbura expelled the UN’s security chief, Paul Debbie, after a UN report was leaked that claimed that the CNDD-FDD was arming its Imbonerakure youth militia; while, six months later, Kinshasa expelled Scott Campbell, director of the UN Joint Human Rights Office, over the office’s report on alleged police abuses in the country.

The European Union

The European Union funds a variety of development, governance, humanitarian, and security projects in the Great Lakes. Koen Vervaeke, the EU Senior Coordinator for the Great Lakes Region, was appointed in October 2011. Although the organisation deployed two small, short-term military missions to the DRC in 2003 and 2006, EU success in the region has been mixed. A 2013 report by the European Court of Auditors found that, while the EU’s projects in the DRC were generally targeting relevant issues of electoral processes, security sector reform, and rule of law, fewer than half could be counted as successes, and even fewer were likely to be

The Great Lakes region faces two core problems: animosity between national leaders, and the DRC’s inability to control its eastern provinces effectively. Brussels endorses work at all levels – local, national, and regional – to address these issues.

The leaders of the four states in the region have a long history of animosity towards each other. This hostility does not seem to be broadly shared among the citizens of the Great Lakes region, which holds out hope for an eventual resolution of these conflicts. Unfortunately, the governments in all four Great Lakes countries are autocratic and personalistic, meaning that it may be difficult to translate a desire for reconciliation and cooperation on the part of citizens into effective state action. Strong regional norms against autocracy and in favour of democratic accountability could help rectify this situation, but other states in the regional organisations to which the Great Lakes countries belong, such as Sudan (in the ICGLR) and Zimbabwe (in SADC), are themselves examples of poor governance.

The EU believes that the Congolese government’s inability to control its eastern provinces is a major source of regional instability. The DRC is in need of serious and prolonged security sector reform, even though the climate in 2015 is even less conducive to reform than it has been in the past. Many individual officers in the Congolese army are well trained but, on the whole, there is little unity of command. The army bears the scars of having integrated numerous armed groups and of having been trained by uncoordinated international programmes. This has often continued the culture of indiscipline and abuses. In Brussels’s view, more emphasis needs to be placed on effectively addressing the illegal exploitation of Congolese minerals, primarily from the eastern Kivu provinces.

In general, international action in the region should be led by the AU and regional organisations, with the UN and other players (including continental powers such as South Africa and Nigeria) in support roles. Special envoys can be especially valuable for their ability to react quickly and influence individual leaders. For example, the meeting between President Joseph Kabila, Angola’s José Eduardo Dos Santos, and South Africa’s Jacob Zuma in the Angolan capital of Luanda in March 2014, at which Dos Santos and Zuma pledged support for the Congo in its efforts to ensure stability in its East, was facilitated by the group of special envoys.

International action should also focus on building regional diplomatic capacity, particularly of the ICGLR and other regional institutions, and promoting the Peace, Security, and Cooperation Framework, signed in Addis Ababa in February 2013. EU representatives have, for example, consulted the Rwandan government about Burundi, particularly concerning refugee flows into Rwanda in response to the current unrest (more than 56,000 refugees as of June 2015). Only concerted diplomacy by the EAC and SADC is likely to be able to avert further violent confrontation in Burundi, and perhaps in the region more generally, over the political crisis in Burundi. Similarly, one attractive way to address illicit mineral exploitation in the Congo would be to create an African intelligence facility to investigate and track abuses. A fully functional African Standby Force (ASF), or the interim African Capacity for Immediate Response to Crisis (ACIRC), the latter created in May 2013, if willing and able to impose peace, could intercede in situations similar to those in Burundi and the eastern Congo in the future. The East African Brigade has undertaken contingency planning for a military force in this regard.

In the short to medium term, the EU is prepared to continue funding Africa’s peace and security architecture of regional and continental bodies, as seems necessary given their currently limited capacities. In addition to €750 million in support to the African Peace Facility (APF) for 2014 through 2016, Brussels has pledged €29 million, through its African Union Support Programme II, for 2014 through 2017. In the long term, however, the level of donor dependency in African institutions – for example, 80 per cent of the AU’s programme budget is funded by the EU – will remain a problem that leaves African regional bodies vulnerable to external agendas.

Policy Recommendations

The following ten recommendations emerged from the Franschhoek policy advisory group seminar of May 2015.

1. Autocratic governance structures throughout the Great Lakes region hinder national socio-economic progress, and have spread instability. Regional states themselves should adopt measures to ensure public debate and accountability for their foreign policies. Regional organisations such as SADC, the EAC, the ICGLR, and the AU can contribute to these changes by strengthening their diplomatic engagement in support of norms of democracy and human rights, as well as promoting civic engagement and civic education.

2. Central to any peacemaking strategy in Burundi must be efforts to address the divisions in the country’s ruling CNDD-FDD and opposition parties, as well as the violence of the CNDD-FDD’s Imbonerakure youth wing. Urgent diplomatic efforts are required to resolve the ongoing political impasse, but longer-term efforts to develop the capacity and democratic commitments of political parties in Burundi, as well as to reform politicised government agencies such as the National Commission on Land and Other Assets and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, are also essential.

3. Security sector reform throughout the region is a critical need. The Great Lakes region is a militarised space, in which political and military institutions have often become fused in ways that have hindered the development of democracy. A concerted diplomatic and reform effort is therefore urgently needed not only to prevent abuses among organised armed actors, but also to move states away from the use of fear and repression in their governance practices more generally.

4. Grassroots, bottom-up initiatives to promote peace and reconciliation, such as the work of local non-governmental organisations (including women’s organisations) and traditional conflict resolution processes, should be supported with financial, logistical, and technical resources. Examples of existing projects that could be built upon, or learned from, include the East African Court of Justice’s cooperation with civil society organisations in Uganda to promote human rights, the Swiss Tujenge Amani! programme in the DRC’s Kivu provinces, and Dutch support for decentralised land registration in Burundi.

5. Governments in the region and their external supporters should strengthen the conflict resolution capacity of existing regional structures, such as the Southern African Development Community, the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region, and the East African Community. One immediate way to strengthen the capabilities of regional organisations in the Great Lakes could be for SADC to complete its efforts to establish a liaison office in the DRC.

6. The African Union and the United Nations should take the lead in efforts to address the challenges of the Great Lakes region, assisted by African powers such as South Africa. The European Union, the United States, and China should play a supporting role. A coordinated, consistent, and coherent strategy will allow different actors to leverage their particular strengths, avoid partiality, and prevent regional actors from engaging in “forum shopping” that plays different mediators off against each other.
7. There must be a process of consultation and coordination among SADC, the AU, and other regional organisations, backed by the UN (including its technical bodies, such as the Department of Peacekeeping Operations [DPKO]), and the EU, to create a concrete roadmap and a unified strategy to resolve the impasse between the UN peacekeeping mission and the government of the DRC in order to forestall similar difficulties in the future. This strategy must be clearly conveyed not only to the government in Kinshasa, but also to governments in Kigali and Kampala.

8. The UN peacekeeping force in the DRC should develop an effective end-game to its 15-year mission in the country. One element of this strategy could be a redeployment of existing UN troops to strengthen the SADC-led intervention brigade. However, any exit strategy must be carefully considered and developed in cooperation with the AU, regional organisations, and the Congolese government in order to ensure that responsible national and regional structures are in place and adequately resourced before the UN withdraws from the country.

9. An international regime should be established that monitors and punishes illicit exploitation of the DRC’s mineral resources; such a system should be backed by the creation of a regional intelligence facility under the auspices of SADC or the International Conference on the Great Lakes Region. Without a more effective regime than the one currently in place, there will be insufficient incentive for regional actors to stop plundering the Congo’s resources.

10. Donor governments, the AU, and others with influence over Rwanda and Uganda must prevent these two countries from destabilising the region. Neither the legacy of the Rwandan genocide nor parochial national interests should stand in the way of holding all countries accountable to the same human rights standards. The AU, African governments, and the broader international community should ensure that norms relating to human rights and democratic governance are enforced in an even-handed manner including, where appropriate, through the use of targeted sanctions and judicial prosecutions.
Postscript

The policy advisory group seminar held by CCR in the Western Cape in May 2015 on “Security and Governance in the Great Lakes Region” was held at a time of significant upheaval in the region. Burundi’s President Pierre Nkurunziza had just formally declared that he would seek a third presidential term, thus deepening the unrest in Burundi; the Democratic Republic of the Congo was moving forward with plans to hold local elections and re-draw its provincial borders; and the future of MONUSCO was uncertain. This context contributed to the timeliness of discussions at the seminar, but it was inevitable that some events would unfold in the time between the seminar and the finalisation of this report.

The Democratic Republic of the Congo

The June 2015 target for redrawing the DRC’s provincial borders, and increasing the number of provinces from 11 to 26, was not met. While commissions to plan the breakup (découpage) of provinces were established in April 2015, they had not completed their work in all areas. At the time of writing, it was not clear when the process might move forward.

In June 2015, MONUSCO began joint military operations with the FARDC against the Ituri Patriotic Resistance Front (FRPI), making some territorial gains against the rebel group. In a March 2015 report, the UN had identified the FRPI as “renewed threat to civilian life and property” in the wake of a failed surrender deal with the Congolese government. However, the FRPI is a small group that has been the target of repeated UN and FARDC operations since 2005. Full-fledged military cooperation between MONUSCO and Kinshasa was resumed in July 2015, with the UN blinking first by dropping its insistence that the government replace its red-listed military commanders.

Burundi

Following the seminar, in May 2015, a faction within the Burundian military, led by former intelligence chief Godefroid Niyombare, attempted a coup d’état. President Nkurunziza was out of the country at the time, attending an EAC summit on the pre-election unrest in Burundi in the Tanzanian capital of Dar es Salaam. The putchists, however, were not able to gain the backing of the entire military, and Nkurunziza returned to the country after only a day to foil the coup. In the wake of this crisis, elections were delayed. Parliamentary and local elections planned for May 2015 were held in June 2015, while presidential polls were held in July 2015. AU Commission chair Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, bluntly noting that Nkurunziza’s third-term presidential bid violated both Burundi’s constitution and the Arusha peace accord, had called for a delay in the polls. A preliminary statement from the UN electoral observation mission stated that the June 2015 polls had not been “free, credible and inclusive”. The AU, the UN, and the EU all refused to recognise the outcome of the July 2015 presidential election which Nkurunziza won amid a low turn-out and opposition boycott.

The security and governance situation in this volatile region remained precarious in August 2015, and it was uncertain how soon the stormy waters of the Great Lakes could be calmed.
